

New Mexico Quarterly

Volume 33 | Issue 1

Article 20

1963

Albert Schweitzer 1962

Cecil Robert Lloyd

Follow this and additional works at: <https://digitalrepository.unm.edu/nmq>

Recommended Citation

Lloyd, Cecil Robert. "Albert Schweitzer 1962." New Mexico Quarterly 33, 1 (1963). <https://digitalrepository.unm.edu/nmq/vol33/iss1/20>

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by the University of New Mexico Press at UNM Digital Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in New Mexico Quarterly by an authorized editor of UNM Digital Repository. For more information, please contact disc@unm.edu.

CECIL ROBERT LLOYD

ALBERT SCHWEITZER, 1962

Your hammer swings our age and strikes home nailing scaffolds to facades of deeds patiently raised from stone-hearted heavy needs worn altars by arches of our tears.

We walk the base
of action, stroking sometimes the pores and polish, or trace the joints and bonds settled by gravity.
Sometimes we enter silence stepping past shrines and bright leaping saints into hot beams tunneled from where we hear you still at work to close your contours over man and build your sky;
then we stare upward from our flowered focus and await release—your limp hand and the echoes of the last blow at impact of what falls from you,
and what swung you:

then we know how we too must step outside and clatter up to wield and try hammers to leaves of gold, our guild your sky.

V. BARRETT PRICE

MOONSTONE BEACH

I walk singing
deep inside the moon;
(now)
the stroked
and sighing
sea
runs coolly
up into the sky.

Curved,
balanced,
smooth,
and mirrored
vision;
the night
is bathed
and floating
deep inside
itself.