INTRODUCTION

This first issue of Volume 33 of the New Mexico Law Review focuses on the impact of recent trends upon New Mexico's legal practice. The articles compiled herein are written by professors, practitioners, and students and cover a range of topics. Professor Ted Occhialino, of the University of New Mexico School of Law, sets forth a review of the twenty-year evolution of the New Mexico law of several liability, comparing it to that set forth in the recently adopted Restatement (Third) of Torts and providing a counterpoint for jurisdictions that might consider adopting the Third Restatement. Also in this issue: a practical guide to navigating the transformation from print to electronic document filing in the courts, an analysis of the legal authority supporting the executive order establishing military commissions post-September 11th, an exploration of the applicability and usefulness of federalism in developing sources of law for the Web, and a critique of the Tenth Circuit's various rationales for disallowing the use of private contracts to expand judicial review of arbitration awards beyond that set by the Federal Arbitration Act.
