Please join us for a presentation by Greenleaf Visiting Scholar Brenda Elsey, on Thursday, September 1 at 12 noon in the History Commons Room, Mesa Vista Hall. Refreshments will be served.

On September 11, 1973, the Chilean armed forces carried out a coup against the democratically-elected government of Socialist president Salvador Allende. In the months that followed the military regime, led by General Augusto Pinochet, launched a massive campaign of repression against supporters of Allende's government, including unionists, student leaders, and leftist political party members. A transnational solidarity movement emerged from the relationship between exile communities, international organizations, and opposition groups in Chile. By the 1980s, many of these groups transitioned to human rights organizations. Through its embrace of human rights, the solidarity movement challenged Cold War polarities. An analysis of the relationship between popular culture and the solidarity movement sheds light on the nature of the uneven shift from a Marxist, anti-imperialist agenda to a broader human rights platform. This project examines the solidarity movement through cultural practices, including needlework, football, music, and beauty pageants. The Southwest Historical Center’s collection contains valuable resources related to U.S. solidarity with Latin America. This project has made particular use of the Kay Cole papers and Slick poster collection. Kay Cole's leadership in the Chilean solidarity brought together Latin American, Indian rights', feminist, and Chicano movements.
