GENERAL INTRODUCTION

1. Archival Comment

Well over thirty years ago, while putting the early mission archives of New Mexico into some semblance of order, I gathered together hundreds of extant pre-nuptial investigations into one large body of DMs (that is, Diligencias Matrimoniales) which were classed as such at the beginning of my descriptive calendar, Archives of the Archdiocese of Santa Fe (1957). Whereas I had sorted out the documents according to years, my regular duties prevented me from numbering each one chronologically within a given year; hence the lack of month-and-day sequence within each given year in the originals as well as this present compilation. Despite it, however, this numbered assemblage by years proves adequate enough.

A goodly number of the earliest DMs had already come in handy for identifying pioneer settlers in my Origins of New Mexico Families in the Spanish Colonial Period (1954). Then other such early DMs turned up among other archival bundles, while I discovered additional ones at some of the old parishes. All these I published as "Addenda to New Mexico Families" in the pages of the Museum of New Mexico's El Palacio (vol. 62, Nov. 1955—vol. 64, Aug. 1957). Needless to say, when we consider the dates given on the title-page, all of these published extracts comprise but a small fraction of the entire, if incomplete, collection herewith.
presented in toto at this late date.

Already at that time I had come to recognize these many precious documents' demographic and historic value, besides the more patent genealogical one, and I began extracting their contents for future use. But it took me these entire three decades to accomplish the entire painstaking task, working at sometimes year-long intervals as circumstances allowed. (My military service in World War II and the Korean conflict were two such lengthy instances.) It was during my recent stint as archdiocesan archivist (1976-1982) that I managed to do the last half of the DM body in my spare time. The past fifteen months or so were then devoted to editing and typing out the scribbled contents in a stack of notebooks.

The enormity of the project can be judged by anyone who checks on any average specimen, generally consisting of eight or more folio-size pages in closely written script, some of it good or fair, but in the main atrocious. But an acquired expertise enabled me decipher each and every page carefully, and thus sift out whatever historical or other nuggets were buried inside the long-worded and age-hardened genealogical motherlode.

The results are here presented in a brief and concise uniform order not to be found in the originals, of course. Their arrangement in yearly sequence within FAMILY NAMES, these listed alphabetically, seemed the most practical solution for avoiding a superlong index of the marital couples and their respective parents. Also, a cross-reference to the female parties was inspired, not merely as a bow to the ERA movement, but to facilitate the search for those who have a distaff subject to start with; this also shows at a glance the relative size of the different families treated.

As for the numberless historical and geographic bits of precious information contained throughout, an index of them must be left for someone with the patience for searching through a haystack. Nevertheless, the dedicated and accomplished researcher in this regard will find delight enough, and be amply rewarded, by going over all the pages of this cut-and-dried presentation. The person with previous facts and dates at his or her command will, of course, find the task much simpler.

2. The DMs' History

In 1776, Padre Atanásio Domínguez reported finding six bundles of matrimonial investigations, ranging from the year 1619 to his day, in the custodial library of Santo Domingo Pueblo. It was in that year of 1619 that the Franciscan Custody of New Mexico had been formally established with its headquarters in said pueblo, hence the conclusion is that these documents had escaped destruction in the Pueblo Revolt of 1680. However, only two such pre-Revolt samples have survived to this day (Feb. 1678 and April 1, 1680). Then, we may ask, what happened to the rest of them after 1776, along with many others of the very same 18th century?
We have a hint in an 1817 statement of Vicar Ladrón de Guevara, who wrote that in 1737 a former Vicar Bustamante had removed the mission archives from Santo Domingo to Santa Fe. He was wrong about Bustamante, who served briefly as vicar in 1732-1734, and also concerning the removal of the entire archives. What very likely happened is as follows. The very first vicar for the bishop of Durango was Don Santiago Roybal, a native Santa Fean who served from 1730 until his death in 1774. What seems most likely is that he kept or removed only the DMs pertaining to his term until 1760 (for these three decades are entirely missing). After 1760, when he was aging, he could have let them remain at Santo Domingo, except for the ones pertaining to Santa Fe. Then, after he died at the age of 80, his Roybal relatives and heirs, upon finding these DMs and other loose documents in his house, converted them to other uses. (It was not uncommon for people in those times to glaze small windows with the parchment-like papers for lack of glass, or to cut a page into small pieces for writing messages or even rolling punch cigarettes!) Or, if such documents did survive in the Santa Fe parish archive, they were lost or stolen much later on, perhaps even in our century, when the earliest of the Santa Fe bound registers of Baptisms, Marriages and Burials also disappeared.

But, once again, what about the DMs from 1619 to 1680, and which were still in existence in 1776? Were they still at Santo Domingo when the church and convento were washed away by the Rio Grande in the late 1800s? This we shall never know. What we do know, while woefully mourning their loss, is that their survival would have provided us with a record of marriages during New Mexico's very first century. As we can gather from the only two extant samples, our history for that period would be that much richer with all kinds of information other than the marital one.

As for the great number of DMs which fortunately we do have, their survival rests on various factors. First, we have several DMs which were drawn up during the colonists' exile at El Paso del Norte between 1680 and 1693, and then following the Vargas Recuest from 1694 to 1730.

Where they were in 1933, when Archbishop Gerken ordered all old documents brought in from the parishes to his Santa Fe Chancery, is impossible to say. As for the greater number of them, dating from 1760 to 1869, they evidently came from the parishes in which they had been drawn up, and where they had survived as if by accident. For there are many more from one parish than from another, and this is simply because in certain places bunches of DMs suffered loss through sheer neglect, their use for other purposes as stated before, or else to the ravages of fire and weather.

To repeat, the Santa Fe parish is the one most poorly represented for the reasons already stated.

These diligencias matrimoniales had been taken most seriously by the pioneer Franciscan Padres, both before and after the New Mexico Missions came under the bishop of Durango in 1730. (Prior to this, because of the new colonists involved, the DMs contained much more information, both about the witnesses questioned and the marital parties themselves.

The few secular clergy who began arriving from Durango after 1800 were no less faithful to this very strict ecclesiastical regulation, both during the closing Spanish era and in the brief Mexican interlude of 1821-1846, when the United States took over New Mexico. The practice continued as usual until a bishopric was established in Santa Fe a few years later.

It ceased "officially," one might say, with the arrival of Bishop Lamy in 1851, since the American hierarchy was not observing this universal church regulation, among others. (Pre-marital questionnaires were not restored in this country until the 1940s!) Yet, in a couple of New Mexico parishes where Lamy's new clergy had not taken over, some native priests continued the venerable old practice until they died or were ousted by 1869. Most of what we have for successive decades, and in most uneven quantities, came from the parishes of Abiquiu, Albuquerque, Tomé, Isleta, Belén, Socorro and San Miguel del Vado. A small number survived from Taos after the parish grew under the famed Padre Martínez in the 1820s; he, incidentally, printed the very first DMs in the United States. But it seems as though most of the Taos DMs disappeared in the hands of his heirs after Martínez broke relations with Bishop Lamy and passed away.

Finally, the sizeable DM collection herewith presented is far from complete in its geographical and genealogical scope. (Hence the temptful appending of "LIMITED" to this work's title.) And yet, despite all the shortcomings, it does furnish an excellent general cross-section of New Mexico's Hispanic population according to families, their various inter-relationships, their tenuous identification as españoles or of different origins and castes, their movements or migrations from one section of the region to another, and the individuals' ages and occupations a great part of the time. This is why, besides the nuptial parties and their respective parents, the testifying witnesses have likewise been included, for these contribute as much, and often more, to the general demographic picture, here one of flesh and blood rather than mere statistics. Both with regard to these witnesses and the marital couples themselves, many an interesting or important historical item emerges.

Another important point to consider is that many of these DMs supply for Marriage Registers which are now missing, or else provide more information than do the entries in books which are extant. A goodly number of these DMs are undated, but they have been inserted within any given year (with approximate dates in parentheses), these signifying the tenure at a given parish of the priest mentioned in the DM. Also inserted are some dispensations as found in an extant logbook kept by Vicar Juan Felipe Ortiz for the years 1832-1839. (AASF, Accounts LXXVI.)

One more final note to this section. Some errors could have crept into such an enormous task as this one surely was. The years and serial numbers given make it easy for anyone to check on the original documents, microfilms of which are available at the New Mexico State Film and Records Center.
in Santa Fe. (Access to the originals in the church archives is discouraged for very good reasons.) Here it also must be noted that some DMs and other mission documents disappeared in the interim between 1957 (when my calendar was published) and 1976 when I returned as archivist. This is because the chancery secretaries had allowed individuals to rummage unescorted through the archives. Hence some items here listed might not appear in the microfilm, but will be found in my genealogical publications previously cited. Any DMs purloined prior to the microfilming, and which I had not yet examined, must be given up for lost.

3. The DMs Themselves

To the unitiated layperson, they present their own peculiar problems, hence the following information. First, their primary purpose was to assure the freedom of the respective parties to contract marriage, hence to forestall bigamy; but much more often it was to uncover any close relationships between the couples, whether by blood (consanguinity) or by marriage (affinity), all of which would require a dispensation from higher church authorities. Very close or multiple relationships had to be referred to the bishop's chancery in Durango; simpler ones could be taken care of by the bishop's vicar in Santa Fe, or else by the local pastor if he had special faculties to do so.

Now, these DMs, whether requiring a dispensation or not, were strictly obligatory for the Spanish population. Likewise included were any other ethnic individuals or groups observing a Spanish way of life. These latter living among the españoles were designated either as indios in general, or else specified according to their tribal origins such as Panena, Caigua, Aá, Apache and so forth. Their mixed offspring were called genizaros, but we sometimes find this interchangeable with indios, if not mestizos whether this term applied strictly or not. Occasionally there is the term mulato, and again whether it actually applied to African origins or not.

It also will be noted that the Pueblo Indians, except for a number of quite late examples, are not included in these DMs. This was because they were exempt from this regulation. Hence the few instances have been relegated to an Appendix at the end of this collection, along with a historical explanation for such an exemption.

As for the dispensations granted for blood and marriage relationships, it will be seen that marriages between first to third cousins were quite common among the Hispanic folk. This was mainly because of the restricted size of the Spanish population, both in general as regards the region, and in particular concerning groups of settlements when communications between them were rare. (The Latin term used was angustia loci, or "narrowness" of the settled area.) Then, too, there was the common practice among the landowning, more well-to-do families of closely intermarrying with each other. Besides giving angustia loci for an excuse, they brought up the necessity of keeping the Spanish blood-lines pure! Actually, it was to consolidate the wealth of land and livestock among the privileged few.
In such cases, incidentally, family trees were drawn up for submitting to the Durango chancery. But, because most of them were written on a separate sheet from the DM itself, and the chancery did not return them when the dispensation was granted, we have very few such samples concerning the so-called ricos. On the other hand, more of the less complicated among the common folk have survived. Hence, it can be said that in this collection the meek inherited a historical identity if not the land. In these instances for simpler dispensations, the trees had been included in the DMs themselves. However, if they had been written separately and submitted to the vicar in Santa Fe, these also had not been returned, and they consequently suffered loss for the reasons already stated.

Then there are certain terms throughout the DMs which require further explanations for the uninitiated. CONSANGUINITY in the transverse line (horizontally), could be in the second degree, third degree, and fourth degree (first, second and third cousins). Beyond this last there were no blood impediments. The same Consanguinity in the indirect or uneven line (obliquely), could refer to an uncle or aunt; ordinarily it meant first cousins once to thrice removed as we say today.

The same held for AFFINITY, with similar degrees of relationships arising from marriage. Also included here was Copula illicita, which was then considered by law as a diriment impediment. This meant previous carnal relations by either party with a close relative of the intended.
Hence, such instances of unlawful coitus had to be disclosed as a matter of conscience, which in our times looks like an unlawful invasion of privacy. But the Hispanic machismo of the times was not embarrassed by such matters, and, besides, it was most likely common knowledge already because of the angustia loci.

One other feature deserving notice is that the DMs were taken up and written by lay notaries, and not by the local pastor. One can tell from the script, the signatures, and the faithful adherence to the required chancery forms of interrogation that some notaries were quite literate individuals. Conversely, other notaries were not so, for opposite reasons, several of whom failed to identify themselves in their defective chores.

As to the questionnaire forms themselves, one can also discern that some of them differed from others in their requirement at different periods and in different parishes. This was because the Durango chancery changed the forms at times (as when a new bishop took over), while in New Mexico certain notaries ignored such changes and adhered to previous forms of inquiry. And so, different DMs are richer than others in information, due either to the forms followed or the mental capacity of the notary.

4. Final Editorial Comment

A word has to be said about my treatment of certain features, done for the sake of clarity and uniformity. First of all, there is the spelling of family surnames and the individuals' given or baptismal names — all of which were written in those times in a vast variety of spellings.
With regard to surnames, I chose to use the correct Spanish spelling; in some family headings I added a variation still to be found in Spain and Latin America. Then there are certain ones which I spelled according to their almost exclusive usage from the beginning, and hence now distinctively New Mexican surnames. Of such are Sisneros and Sedillo (instead of the original and correct Cisneros and Cedillo). Also, Abetia and the now common Abeyta, which derive from Veitia, used only with the very first individual of this name. Finally, there are two other more distinctively New Mexican appellations, due to more radical changes. One is Nuanes or Noanez, a corruption of Unanue. The other is Ruybalid, a more radical corruption which evolved from Ulibarri.

As for baptismal names, some of which were spelled at times almost beyond recognition, I naturally settled on their correct derivation from their Hebraic, Greek, Latin, and even Visigothic or Germanic originals. One misspelling I kept, for being consistently New Mexican from the start, is Damasio for the more correct Dámaso.

When it came to Spanish accent marks, which are so plentiful for place-names as well as personal names and surnames, I left them out altogether in the main text. This was to spare myself considerable trouble while typing it, as well as the typesetter should it ever be published. Anyway, in this country we generally dispense with such accent marks.

Lastly, I kept ethnic designations in their original Spanish, since their precise meaning often varies in English translation. In this same connection, it will be noticed that, following Mexican Independence in 1821, español gave way to Mexicano. But only briefly. The older term was resumed for a while, except in two parishes where the second one lingered a bit longer. This was because the priests in Tomé and Santa Cruz were natives of Mexico, and found this a way for expressing their patriotism. Finally, both español and mexicano had disappeared from the DMs some years before the American Occupation of 1846.
POPULATION DISTRIBUTION

This addition to the foregoing General Introduction comes as an afterthought, for the convenience of the interested party or researcher who may not have certain historical facts ready at hand.

One thing which distinguishes New Mexico's Hispanic folk from other Latin-American peoples — and the English settlers on this continent — is the single fact that here the original population remained very small and restricted. This alone lends particular value and importance to this present collection. For, situated far inland from any seaports, as well as isolated from New Spain (later Mexico), New Mexico did not enjoy the continuous increment of new arrivals from Europe or even the rest of Spanish America closer by. Hence the number of families remained quite small, so that today one can tell at a glance whether Hispanic names appearing in the news are native New Mexican or not.

Moreover, at least up until 1800, there was relatively little inter-mixture of families of what was called the Rio Arriba north of Santa Fe and the Rio Abajo south of the Capital. It was around that the founding of San Miguel del Vado out on the Pecos began drawing families, first from Santa Fe in the middle, and then from both the Rio Arriba and Rio Abajo. After this there began a closer integration of the entire, if still restricted, Hispanic population. And here, also, the geographic extent was just as restricted.
Whenever we think of New Mexico as a geographical entity, we picture to ourselves the uneven rectangle outlined on our national maps. But such was not the case in old Spanish and later Mexican times prior to the American Occupation and the Gadsden Purchase which followed it soon after. As a matter of fact, neither Spain nor Mexico had ever drawn definite boundary lines away from the settled parts. For two centuries and a half, New Mexico had consisted solely of the undefined populated north-Rio Grande watershed, both Hispanic and Pueblo Indian, from the northernmost Tiwa pueblo of Taos down to the later extinct Piro pueblos of Socorro. An undefined space surrounded the uneven settled areas, while the vast territory in every direction was referred to as the "provinces" of the wild nomadic Indians which inhabited them.

Moreover, the distribution of the Hispanic population varied at different periods, and this is best shown by reviewing it by centuries.

1. The First Century

For the greater part of her very first decades, 1598-1680, New Mexico was but sparsely settled by Spanish colonists. When constituted in 1610 as El Reino de la Nueva Mexico, her only Spanish town was her Capital, Santa Fe. It also consisted of a barrio or ward called Analco, for some volunteer Indian servant from Tlascalteca whom the first colonists had brought along; these individuals of superior quality were soon superseded by mestizos and mulatos of lower class who, having arrived as servants to some officials, or lackeys in the triennial supply trains, happened to remain.

North of Santa Fe, there was only a small cluster of Spanish homesteads called simply La Cañada (present Santa Cruz area). Immediately south were others such, like those of Los Cerrillos (not the present town of this name, but the conical hills north of it), and others along the Camino Real as it then wound its way through the fertile ravine of La Ciénega. South from here, in what came to be named El Rio Abajo, other scattered clusters ranged along the banks of the Rio Bravo del Norte (now the Rio Grande), from the spots called Angostura and Bernalillo in the Sandía jurisdiction through the present site of Albuquerque (which was the Trujillo estancia of San Francisco Xavier), and down to the more famous estancia of Tomé Domínguez de Mendoza (present Tomé). Still further south were the smaller ones of Sevilleta (present La Joya), then Alamillo and finally Luis López by the Piro Indian pueblos of Socorro, Senecu and Qualacu.

Besides these regular homesteads, the called estancias, there were the far-spread Pueblo Indian Missions. At the major ones there resided some soldiers or even supervisory captains, some of them with their families, placed there to help the missionaries and their charges from hostile Indian tribes. When the 1680 Pueblo Revolt broke out, a number of these isolated Spaniards were wiped out, along with the twenty-one Franciscan padres who were massacred at their stations. (Some young females were spared by the rebels to be kept as captives, and these were rescued thirteen years later, along with some half-breed children they had acquired in the meantime).

As we know, the majority of the colonists escaped the general massacre and fled far down to El Paso del Norte. This Mission of Guadalupe del Paso had been founded some years before by a friar from Socorro for the purpose of civilizing the wild Indians of that region; the first Spanish people sent there to protect the padres had been New Mexico colonists, as the extant mission records show. Following the 1680 debacle, New Mexico's governor founded El Real de San Lorenzo (site of San Elizario, Texas) as his Santa Fe in exile, as well as the nearby villages of Socorro del Paso and Socorro del Paso for the faithful Piro Indians who had fled with him, and then Ysleta del Paso for some Tiwas of Isleta in New Mexico who were brought down sometime later. These four new settlements were strung just south of the main Guadalupe del Paso Mission, but, through a drastic change in the Rio Grande's course many years later, they were left on the opposite bank which was eventually taken over by Texas.

What is of utmost importance to note here is that the original settlers of all these southern settlements, El Paso del Norte included, were practically all New Mexicans, whether Hispanic or Pueblo Indian. Even if they now belonged to the province of Nueva Vizcaya, their cultural and blood ties were with the people of New Mexico proper. This stands out in these very DMS, which show that marital and other connections between related old families continued apace for many generations after the Vargas Reconquest of Santa Fe and New Mexico in 1693.

At the very end of this year, Don Diego de Vargas brought back most of the original colonists to resettle their homeland. Practically all of the mestizos and mulatos of Santa Fe’s Analco remained behind, as did the Piro and Tigua Indians at the three new villages named after their home pueblos. However, we discover from these very DMs that some Spanish colonial families likewise stayed behind at El Paso del Norte and its satellite villages of San Lorenzo, Socorro, Senecu and Ysleta. And, as just said, communications between them and their kin in New Mexico would continue for generations to come.

At Santa Fe itself, a large new colony of Españoles-Mexicanos (Spaniards from the city and valley of Mexico), arrived in the Spring of 1694, and with many of these, in 1696, Gov. Vargas founded the Villa of Santa Cruz on the old Cañada site. The following year brought another sizeable colony from Zacatecas (Spaniards again but with several mestizo families among them), and these joined the inhabitants in the two Villas of Santa Fe and Santa Cruz. But the Rio Abajo remained vacant for a time, except for the northern Bernalillo district, due to the fact that the increased number of roving Apaches now made the Rio Abajo area unsafe to live in.

Here we can see at a glance that the Hispanic settled area at this time was smaller than it had been prior to 1680. At the same time, the number of people had increased considerably with the advent of the two new colonies from Mexico and Zacatecas.
2. The Second Century

Don Diego de Vargas died in Bernalillo in 1704, during an Apache campaign which must have been successful otherwise, for in 1706 the founding of New Mexico's third Spanish Villa, Albuquerque, became possible. The first settlers here were the children of those who had homesteaded the area before 1680, as well as descendants of those who had lived in the nearby Angostura-Sandía-Bernalillo district prior to the 1680 Revolt. These were soon being joined by families from the two Mexico and Zacatecas colonies previously mentioned, and all in their turn began spreading down along the river beyond Isleta as far south as Tomé. But here they stopped, for the Apaches—and by now some Navajos—were lords of the land throughout the now vacant Piro Indian country, and beyond as far as El Paso del Norte.

To the north of Santa Fe, families began spreading from the Santa Cruz district to all points in the great valley, (including the long Chimayó ravine), in-between the Tewa Indian pueblos of Nambé, Pojoaque, San Ildefonso, Santa Clara and San Juan. From here they moved northward along the Rio Grande as far as present Velarde. Meanwhile, the Franciscan Padres had restarted their missions in all the major Indian Pueblos, which also served as the religious headquarters for the Spanish settlements around each one. Hence, as it will be noted, the names of Pueblo Indian "parishes" for the Spanish settlers—except for those of the three true parishes of Santa Fe, Santa Cruz and Albuquerque. (Those of Tomé and Belén would follow in this same 18th century, and then those of Don Fernando de Taos, San Miguel del Vado, and Socorro as the next century began.)

In the meantime, a novel ethnic development had begun to take place. Following the Vargas resettlement, the Hispanic folk had started buying, or ransoming as they put it, all kinds of Plains Indian women and children captives from the fierce Comanches during periods of truce. (Others were captured by the Spanish militia in retaliatory forays.) The offspring of these mixed nomadic tribes were then being designated as genízaros, as if they were a new and distinct ethnic breed with Spanish names and a Hispanic upbringing. While some of them remained as servant folk in the three original Villas, as well as at the scattered homesteads north and south of Santa Fe, the majority who were homeless and landless were settled in Abiquiú toward the north of the Capital, while in the south they were established near Tomé, and finally at Los Jarales near Belén. Those in Santa Fe now inhabited the ward of Analco as successors to the pre-1680 mestizos and mulatos who had not returned from El Paso del Norte with the Vargas Reconquest. (One or the other children of the latter had by now returned from the El Paso villages to join these new kind of mestizos.)

Before the mid-1700s, Hispanic families from the Santa Cruz-Santa Clara valley had begun settling the Abiquiú ravine also, as well as the areas of Ojo Caliente and the Taos valley. But these latter settlements were soon wiped out by the northern Utes and Apaches. Then other settlements were started on the western flank of the great sierra, as at Las Truchas, Las Trampas, and Santa Barbara near Picuris (present Peñasco valley), as buffer towns against the Plains Indians who occasionally crossed over the cordillera to raid the valley settlements and Indian pueblos below. These places persevered. However, the first such permanent one up in the Taos valley, Trampas or Ranchos de Taos, was not founded until shortly before 1776, and its people had to keep a sharp watch on the Utes and Jicarilla Apaches.

To sum up, New Mexico as a "Kingdom" since 1610, and then demoted to one of New Spain's "Internal Provinces" in the 1760s, was still confined to the settled Hispanic and Pueblo Indian area of the upper Rio Grande basin. But its inhabited extent was somewhat smaller than in the previous century, since the settled Rio Grande area now reached only from Ranchos de Taos to Tomé. The population itself, however, had become all the more concentrated, what with the increasing number of the Hispanic folk as well as the genizaros. New towns sprang up within the confined areas of both the Rio Arriba and Rio Abajo. Santa Fe in the center, while important as the Capital, remained much the same with its few ranchos in Rio de Tesuque to the north and others from present Agua Fria down to the ravine of La Ciénega. Now the Rio Abajo began with La Cañada de Cochiti, in a ravine northeast of this pueblo, founded by families from Santa Cruz and augmented by some others from Bernalillo and other points south. Also, other settlers were venturing westward into the Jémez region (Vallecito, San Ysidro, Cañon de Guadalupe), and further up to Cerro Cabezón and Nacimiento (present Cuba). But any such small settlements lying either east or west of the Rio Grande valley had to contend with periodic raids by the respective wild tribes on either side.

3. The Third Century

Considerable changes began taking place after 1800. A major expansion started with the establishment of a Spanish fort and genizaro settlements at San Miguel del Vado on the upper Pecos east of the great sierra. These genizaros were the ones who had been occupying Santa Fe's Analco. But soon the San Miguel countryside was being filled by landless Hispanic families, first from Santa Fe itself, and then from the older clans both north and south of the Capital, and particularly from La Cañada de Cochiti in-between. All this gave birth to many towns along the Pecos, from present Pecos itself downriver to Antonchico, with one distant thrust southeast to Galisteo and another northward to Las Vegas.

North of Santa Fe, far up in the Taos valley, the new town of Don Fernando de Taos was born as the century began, followed by other villages in the general vicinity. From older villages north of San Juan, several families braved the Comanche menace to settle the Mora valley east of the great sierra. Far south, in 1816, people from the Tomé-Belén area likewise braved the Apache and Navajo menace to found Socorro on the ruins of the Piro pueblo of this name, as well as other villages in that countryside where the first century's homestead of Luis López and the Piro pueblos of Senecu and Qualacu had been. Westward, some of these Tomé-Belén families ventured into the Cebolleta and San Rafael country despite the great perils presented by the Navajo.

This was the undefined area of New Mexico — that is, without sharply-mapped borders — when the United States took over in 1846. South of Socorro and its satellite villages, it was still a no-man's-land (except for the roving Apaches) until one reached El Paso del Norte (present Ciudad Juárez) on the Mexican side of the Rio Grande, and the four 1680 El Paso settlements which were now on the Texas side.

Soon after 1846, some New Mexico families, unwilling to live under the United States, founded the town of Mesilla in the fertile valley well north of the El Paso settlements just mentioned; this brought new recruits from these settlements to help start the neighboring towns of Las Cruces and Doña Ana. At the time they were part of the Mexican republic, but soon the Gadsden Purchase put them all back in the United States. Hence, geographically, the once vacant Mesilla-Las Cruces area had never belonged to New Mexico proper until our country defined the present limits of the Territory, and then State, of New Mexico! Hence, also, no DMs want for that area.

One last word on the size and territorial extent of New Mexico's old Hispanic families. Even to this day, the most numerous —and therefore more prolific ones — are those descended from the original colonists of New Mexico's First Century! As if they possessed a special elan vital. Next with such vitality are some families which came with the two Vargas colonies from Mexico and Zacatecas, they rest of them having remained relatively small or disappeared altogether. These DMs likewise show that new family names which arrived in this Third Century from Mexico via El Paso del Norte did not grow to any extent or else likewise disappeared.

In substance, Hispanic New Mexico, along with her genizaros now having some Spanish blood mixed with together with their likewise acquired Spanish customs, preserved her own identity both in blood and culture for three full centuries. The story is different in her Fourth One (our own 20th Century), what with the admixtures of race and culture which keep increasing all along.

ARCHIBEQUE

1697 (no. 13), Santa Fe. JUAN DE ARCHIBEQUE (25), n. of Bayona in France and soldier of Santa Fe Presidio. (DM here incomplete, missing part used by Bandelier, see Chavez, Origins of N.M. Families) and ANTONIA GUTIERREZ (26), n. of Tezcuco, widow of Tomas de Hita who, on way from Mexico City, was killed near the City of Zacatecas after Fray Francisco Farfan (in charge of Colony), had sent him for some mules of the wagon-train. This petition restates one of the year before, when marriage was delayed for lack of evidence of Hita's death. Letter confirming this fact was written by Capt. Juan Paez Hurtado, with new information furnished by Padre Farfan.

Witnesses: Capt. Juan Paez Hurtado, Justicia Mayor of El Paso del Norte; Pedro Munier (25), n. of Paris in France and soldier of Santa Fe, who was groom's comrade for 13 years; Santiago Grole (34), n. of Rochela in France who was also groom's comrade for 13 years; Fray Francisco Farfan, now missionary at Santa Ana Pueblo, quotes letter he received at Parral from Fray Antonio de Coca, who on his way to Mexico City had learned that Tomas de Hita had been killed at a rancho near Zacatecas by a mulato, said Padre Coca requesting Padre Farfan to notify victim's wife and Capt. Pascual Garcia. — Letter produced by Capt. Paez Hurtado, one which he had written to Gov. Vargas, his Captain and Compadre, stating that: 1) Francisco de Ayala was shot to death during a fiesta at Villa de Jerez because of his bad character, and his wife (Angela Gonzales) should be notified. 2) Likewise notified should be the wife (Antonia Gutierrez) of a Fulano Sanchez de Hita; she was "una Vermeja" (red-head) assigned to the cart of Miguel Garcia; while looking for some mules at a rancho near Zacatecas, Hita was stabbed by a mulato in a fit of jealousy because of latter's wife. 3) The Rancho de las Huertas (present Algodones) which belongs to his compadre Naranjo should not be given away by Vargas, since the man was returning to New Mexico.
