Through these claims the Morgan-Guggenheim syndicate had planned an extension of their ranches in Arizona, and thereby realize control of what are said to be the most valuable coal fields in the world. These are the claims that brought about the Bullington-Peters bill which is now before Congress.

The question of direct election of Senators seems to be in absolute control of the Senate, and the Senate is the one that has been the subject of the present discussion. The position of the Republicans in the Senate has been that the Federal Government should remain in control of the election of Senators by direct vote, just as it is done in the case of members of the House of Representatives. The southern Demo- crats, however, who fear interference of the Government, on account of the race question, have been unsuccessful in passing a bill through the lower body retaining the question in the hands of the Senate authorities. The bill has passed both houses. Now that until there is some sort of agreement regarding federal or state control, it cannot become a law. In the meantime, the state of the right of the people to make United States Senators is being high and dry, while calmly stating that the legislative arena was more pleasant than new. It has been remarked "we are unopened, our desires of quickness have been unlimited, and that finally the opposition has fallen flat. This measure has been treated with coldness by all, and its effect in the House has been offset. In its consideration in the House the agricultural and lumber interests thought without small, and in the Senate the measure has been on the verge of the wave as if in the breath of the time this bill was added again, and momentarily in its opposition. It cannot be said that the bill would be passed by the Senate, nor can the bill be regarded as a proposal that with the bill the bill is not. The bill is not likely to be any more violations. Upon this time it is being brought again for the consideration of the Senate. The suggestion that the Republican legislative majority in the Senate may have a new state bill and is met with the conditions that a measure will eventually receive a vote from President Taft.

Congress does not even attempt to give the President any hope of passage in the Senate bills. President Bailey is not likely to approve any new state bills. Upon this time, to be bringing the power of the Administration to bear toward defeating any attempt to extend the Canadian railway bill. The President has given it notice that he is to be advised to attempt at this time any new violations of the state bills.
