Welcome Back Lobos,

We are so happy to have the campus full of students and to hear the discussions of creative ideas. Similarly, life and warmth is coming back to the land, as birds are chirping, the sun is getting brighter, and the plants are standing a little taller with each day.

Here at INLP we are transitioning also. We recently hired two new student employees and we are happy to introduce Ashanti Antonio and Raven Alcott to the INLP family. Both students bring previous library and customer service experiences to INLP. We are excited for their ideas and personality to grow our program. We will be profiling them in our next newsletter.

INLP is also excited to announce several programs that will be new for us and we are excited to announce them as we finalize the details. The first, is a ground up exhibit focusing on the impacts of climate change upon Indigenous people and the environment. This exhibit is proposed to open in March 2020 and it will be up until January 2021.

The second is a program highlighting the lives of Indigenous students at UNM by providing an avenue to broadcast it. This yet to be titled program, will be a short film project using the Adobe Creative Cloud platform to build these stories. This project will be announced soon! Stay Tuned :)

Finally, INLP is repositioning itself to be a more purposeful and focused program moving forward. This strategic focus will be align our physical space redesign, programmatic mission and operations to be viable in three thematic topics;

Indigenous Learning, Indigenous Scholarship, and Indigenous Creation. We would love you input as we move forward with announcing our new initiatives.

Thank you,

INLP

Time Management Tips from a Learning Strategist

Guest Contributor: Celene Woolley, Student Manager for Learning Strategies, Center for Academic Program Support

Wait, a what? A Learning Strategist!

Learning Strategies is a program the CAPS, the Center for Academic Program Support, that teaches students skills that will help them be more successful in their classes. These people are fellow students who offer help with time management, effective note-taking, preparing for exams, reading textbooks and articles, and even how study more effectively! They have interactive workshops that help walk you through the steps of implementing a specific tool and also have drop-in and appointment hours to go over any topic one-on-one. Learning Strategies is located on the 3rd floor of Zimmerman Library, just 1 floor above the INLP space. All of CAPS services, including Learning Strategies, are free to UNM students!

Learning Strategist (L to R), Edgar, Jannet, and Kyra in the Learning Strategies Office, 3rd Floor, Zimmerman Library.

Now to the time management part. Time management is one of the biggest struggles identified by college students, and Learning Strategies offers lots of tools to help you keep organized and on top of things. Their worksheet, called the Master Syllabus, takes all of your assignments in every class for the semester and compiles them into a one page document. This lets you see what you have coming up all at once, instead of being week! Stop in to grab a copy of the workshop and have a Learning Strategist walk you through the steps of filling it out, or come chat about any of our other topics.

For more information about Learning Strategies, a workshop schedule, or to explore any of CAPS other services, visit caps.unm.edu.

We would like to thank the Celene Woolley and the rest of the Learning Strategies team for contributing to this newsletter. Their insight and advice will be a great benefit to our Indigenous students at UNM. We highly recommend using the Learning Strategies services in CAPS.

Native American Program Series, 1999-2017

On September 24, 2003, the Native American Program Series began as a joint program of the UNM Indigenous Nations Library Program (INLP) and the Center for Southwest Research. Headed by Mary Alice Tsoosie and Lloyd Lee, the series set out to create and video record programs that address various Native American contemporary issues.

The programs were designed in conjunction with Native American collections housed at the Center for Southwest Research which include American Indian Oral History collection, Sacred Lands Project Collection: 1894-1988, Navajo-Hopi Land Dispute documents: 1854-1984, and Robert F. Robideau American Indian Movement Papers: 1975-1994. Some of the programs recorded in the series are storytelling sessions, student colloquiums, class presentations and lectures.
