On Feb. 23, British Airways, which discontinued service between Mexico City and London in 1983, announced plans to resume flights on that route on March 30. Ian Guillespie, regional director for British Airways, said the airline will initially schedule three round-trip flights per week. The flights will complement existing London-Mexico City service offered by Mexicana airlines. According to Guillespie, an expected increase in trade, investment and other business transactions between European countries and Mexico inspired the decision to return to the Mexican market. Guillespie estimated the route could bring about 35,000 new European visitors to Mexico per year. (Source: Agence France-Presse, 02/23/93)
