

A. W. Boehning, Sr., Architect

1891 - 1962

A. W. Boehning, Sr., was born in Shelbyville, Indiana, on September 27, 1891. Before his army service during World War I, he was a carpenter and builder. He moved to Albuquerque in 1920 and began working with the architectural firm of Trost & Trost, under the U. S. Veterans Bureau of Placement for Disabled Veterans Program.

In 1924, he opened his own architectural office in Albuquerque and designed buildings of all types throughout New Mexico. He held New Mexico Architectural Registration Number Four. Serving on the New Mexico Board of Examiners for Architects from its conception in 1931 until 1950, he was the first Board secretary and later Board chairman.

He served on the New Mexico State Planning Board from 1943 until 1948. He became a corporate member of the American Institute of Architects, when the New Mexico Chapter was formed in 1947.

The architectural office that he initiated in 1924 is being carried on by his two sons.

How to end up in the middle...

It's easy when you install an air conditioning system. Simply buy the major components from different manufacturers—refrigeration equipment here, cooling and heating coils there and fans somewhere else. Put them together. Then try to fix responsibility for their performance. And there you are—right in the middle.

Perhaps you've saved a few dollars. But whom will you call if mechanical trouble develops? Which component needs attention? Where will you turn for service? The answers come easily when you deal with one responsible supplier of major components—able to keep the equipment in first-class operating condition.

Although not the only air conditioning manufacturer offering a broad line of components, Carrier is best prepared to serve the owner should trouble come. For our company and our dealers maintain the largest and best-trained service organization in the business.
